NCCAC building, an architectural work of art

SHAMOKIN — Situated on a hillside near the top of Arch Street between Grant and Eighth lies yet another architectural wonder that still stands in the city of Shamokin. The building known today as the Northumberland County Career and Arts Center (NCCAC) formerly served as the Shamokin High School (SHS) for 60 years, from its opening in 1915 until 1975, when construction of the present Shamokin Area High School (SAHS) building in Coal Township was completed.

Today, the NCCAC building serves the entire county as a multi-purpose educational and cultural center for the arts and humanities. Yet a walk-through of this local architectural wonder takes one back to a bye-gone era when schools and other buildings were designed as much for their beauty as the purpose for which they served. It was a balance of form and function, which seems to have been lost in many of today's cookie-cutter designs.

Architectural wonder

The architect of the former Shamokin High School was William Harold Lee, who also designed Shamokin's one-of-a-kind 2,000-seat showplace, the former Victoria Theatre, which was built two years later in 1917. A National Historic Landmark, "The Vickie" as it was known, was sadly demolished in 1999.

During his career Lee would go on to design some of the most architecturally impressive movie theaters in Pennsylvania. Yet one of his first projects was the former Shamokin High School.

The NCCAC building is an expertly crafted mixture of stained glass, wood, plaster, marble and brass. But beyond the obvious architectural elements, the building also contains many hidden gems, all of which harken back to a time long gone.

Strengthening Hurricane Florence takes aim at US

BY RUSS BYNUM
ASSOCIATED PRESS

A rapidly strengthening Hurricane Florence churned across the Atlantic on Sunday toward a possible direct hit on the U.S. Southeast late this week, triggering warnings to people up and down the coast to get their emergency kits ready, map out escape routes and fill sandbags.

Red flags flying on beaches warned swimmers to stay out of waters already roiled by the distant storm, and cruise ships and Navy vessels were set to be steered out of harm's way. People rushed to buy bottled water, plywood and other supplies.
